Testosterone may be the most important single hormone that aging men need, and small quantities of testosterone precursors can provide a very important role for aging women too.

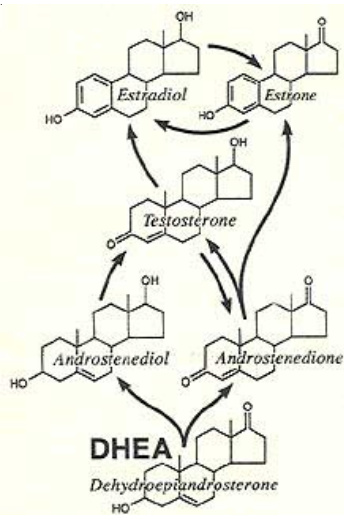

It's a fact that men manufacture small amounts of estrogen and women make small amounts of testosterone, but rather than their production taking place from specific glands, (i.e. the ovaries and the testes), in both sexes chemicals called aromatase convert testosterone to estrogen and vice-versa.

Medical testosterone replacement therapies have been very similar to estrogen replacement therapies in that the synthetic variants that have been used (and still are) are not from natural sources. They are similar to natural testosterone, but they do not duplicate the precise formula of natural human testosterone.

Furthermore, the regimens in which they have been given have not matched natural pulsate timing or dosing. Is it any wonder that testosterone replacement therapies have been associated with serious side effects, as indeed estrogen replacement therapies have?

Finally, clinical scientists and more open-minded individuals in the medical community are beginning to realize that the best answer to anti-aging and its associated testosterone hormone decline is to provide the phytonutrient complexes which enhance the body's natural prohormone precursor production and also actually rejuvenate the body's own testosterone production.

As a result of this clearer scientific approach, we now have available a potent, natural testosterone maximizing botanical formula which also includes natural testosterone precursors to help provide a safer and more natural approach.
